The Ford GT40 can justly be regarded as one of the most successful racing cars of all time. When the Ford Motor Company decided in the early 1960s that competition achievement could benefit the image of their production cars, the machine they designed and built to reach their goal was second to none in terms of development and technology. The result of this open-ended budget (some say the project cost in excess of $50 million even then) was the GT40, the car that finally stole the crown from Ferrari at Le Mans and represented a dominant force in the World Sports Car Championship for a full six years; a truly remarkable achievement, especially when one considers that this was
