Le Mans in 1951, a lone Porsche 356, aluminium-bodied and powered by a modest 1,100cc engine, finished 20th overall. It marked the beginning of great things to come, and throughout the rest of the Fifties the German marque continued to improve and add to its growing list of competition successes. The famed 550 series was, in particular, instrumental in building Porsche's international racing reputation towards the end of the decade.

Introduced in 1964, the 904 model, with a 1,966cc four cylinder engine, was even more sporting in appearance. Enormously successful as a works entry in the under two litre class, it also enjoyed many successes in private hands. Increasing opposition, however, was coming from Ferrari and elsewhere and it soon became clear that the transition to a six cylinder car of a more ser
