When Cadillac resumed civilian automobile production in October 1945, the entire model line benefited from the company's considerable wartime experience, which included the production of some 12,000 M-5 light tanks and motorized gun carriers. Although the postwar Cadillac V8 engines had the same displacement and rated horsepower as their prewar counterparts, many internal parts were improved for greater strength and reliability following the experience gained in combat conditions. The state-of-the-art Hydra-Matic automatic transmission was also improved using the lessons learned in wartime.

Stylistically, just as the 1946 models were a modest makeover of the pr
