Like the previous Abarth 1000 racers, the Barchetta Sport used the familiar twin-cam 1000cc engine that was derived from Fiat 600D and radically tuned to produce 105 bhp. It was placed in a low tube-frame chassis that reflected the same construction techniques engineer Mario Colucci used for Abarth's earlier tube-frame racing cars. This engine was mounted in front of the rear axle and supported by a complex chassis. The resulting body was a dramatically low, distinguished by its flattened profile and wrap-around Perspex windscreen. It was made from fiberglass and both front and rear sections could be flipped open for easy access to
