The Pagani Huayra Lampo proves there's no thunder without lightning

14 December 2017 | Alex Easthope

Directly inspired by the distinctive Fiat Turbina concept car from 1954, the one-off Huayra Lampo is the result of two years of close consultation between Garage Italia Customs and Pagani...

Lightning bolt

After a brush with the law and a temporary hiatus from social media at the beginning of the year, Lapo Elkann is back with a red-and-white carbon-fibre bang. The latest unique creation from the eccentric Italian entrepreneur's bespoke design agency, Garage Italia Customs, the Huayra Lampo — which translates to 'lightning' — is inspired predominantly by Fiat's 1950s Turbina concept.

The most obvious design cue is the red-and-white paintwork, which boasts a smattering of lightning bolt logos in the colours of the Italian tricolour. The paint is also transparent, showing off the beautifully crafted (and aluminium-injected) carbon-fibre bodywork — itself the recipient of some special aerodynamic upgrades, namely from the more extreme Huayra BC. In the cabin, there's a funky hand-braided leather interior, crafted by an artisan in Turin, while all the exposed aluminium has been anodised in bronze. Do we want one? Absolutely. Can we have one? Absolutely not — sadly, this is a one-off creation. Write a big enough cheque to Garage Italia Customs, however, and we're sure Mr Elkann would only be too happy to oblige in helping you create the car of your wildest dreams.
